Sleight of Mouth * * Changing Limiting Core Beliefs

Using the Spoken Language to Influence Therapeutic Change

April 24 and 25, 2010

When the modeling tools of NeuroLinguistic Programming (NLP) were used to study some of the world's most powerfully influential communicators such as Milton H. Erickson and Virginia Satir, an impressive set of language patterns called Sleight of Mouth emerged. Why were these patterns labeled "Sleight of Mouth?" Because the etymology of the word sleight is "adroit" or "masterful." Hence, Sleight of Mouth is the use of the spoken language to influence masterfully.

Making changes at the level of belief, values and identity. Core beliefs can enhance or severely limit the quality of a person's life. Most problematic beliefs are ingrained early in life when people are unable to make conscious, intelligent choices. Nonetheless, these limiting beliefs can have wide-ranging consequences that determine self-esteem, self-worth, personal development, behavioral choices and enjoyment in life.

Therapists can assist clients remediate specific problematic behaviors, but helping people make changes to limiting core beliefs can have the a far greater impact on their success in daily living and their very sense of selfness. Beliefs powerfully influence a person's experience. They are the guiding principles, the maps used to make sense of and respond to the world. The sources of beliefs come from our culture, modeling of significant others, and personal critical experiences whether positive or traumatic.

The purpose of this training is to teach you how to use Sleight of Mouth and Meta programs an extraordinary combination Ericksonian and NLP tools, with which to help people effectively change the limiting beliefs that keep them stuck, feeling incapable, or viewing themselves in negative ways.
